Sadness is a hallmark symptom of grief, which in turn is the consequence of losing something we care about. In this way you could say that sadness and love are inextricably linked. Yes, when you are grieving, it is normal to feel sad. Meredith Fields-Lawler shares why it is important to embrace the sadness and discomfort of grief and shares what we should never say to the greiving.

Sadness is a hallmark symptom of grief, which in turn is the consequence of losing something we care about. In this way you could say that sadness and love are inextricably linked. When you are grieving, it is normal to feel sad.

Sadness is quieter than anger, fear, despair, or guilt and often leads to greater vulnerability. Your veil is lowered, and your defense mechanisms are not as necessary as they once were. Sadness is adaptive and vital to your being. But life, every life, will also bring pain and sadness: Some we love are ill, and despite great effort, cannot be helped. Some we love die.
