The object of this book has been to define the relation of the classical Greek State to commerce in all its forms and activities, and to describe its commercial policy. In Greece and the wider Aegean, local, regional, and international trade exchange existed from Minoan and Mycenaean times in the Bronze Age. The presence, in particular, of pottery and precious goods such as gold, copper, and ivory, found far from their place of production, attests to the exchange network which existed between Egypt, Asia Minor, the Greek mainland, and . Trade in ancient greece During the archaic and classical periods (roughly to BC), ancient Greece rose as a major trading power in the Mediterranean, building vast commercial networks and a series of trade- and agriculture-oriented colonies throughout the region.
